

Measuring Fragmentation Efficiency of a Blast Using Ground Vibration

*Douglas A. Anderson and James W. Reil
Vibra-Tech Engineers, Hazleton, PA 18201*

Abstract

Common wisdom has it that a blast which breaks rock efficiently should generate less ground vibration. In practice, however, this idea has not been rigorously tested.

In a previous paper presented at an SEE meeting[1] we described a method for controlling vibration using delays. The relationship between the delay and the resulting low-frequency